San Diego, California A portion of Cardiff State Beach was evacuated for two hours when lifeguards were alerted that a beachgoer had found a suspicious device. The item was reportedly found along the shoreline at which time the person who found it picked it up and placed it beside the lifeguard tower.

The San Diego Sheriff's Department Bomb/Arson Unit responded to the scene and determined the device to be safe. It was deemed "undetermined military ordnance" and was removed and properly disposed of by the unit without incident.

Although the item was eventually deemed to be safe, the beachgoer should have not moved or handled the suspect item. Instead, the beachgoer should have alerted the police and the lifeguard of the find.
